More and more, we hear and see situations on and off campus which are, at best, described as people behaving badly. Whether it is someone yakking loudly on a cell phone in the middle of a busy office, an angry demand to drop everything to meet a non-crisis need, or a snide and insensitive remark about a colleague, concern about bullying and ill-mannered behavior is increasing.

A recent article in Business Officer (July/August 2010) examined the increase towards incivility on campus. P.M. Forni, a professor of civility at Johns Hopkins, was interviewed stating that when American workers were asked about the #1 cause of stress at work, in the past, excessive workload was at the top. Now, one of the greatest stressors at work is other people. According to Forni, incivility in the workplace involves anything that lacks respect for a coworker’s time and space. It could be sitting on someone’s desk and looking at their computer screen or entering an office without knocking. Or it might mean not saying good morning or good night, or treating those with whom you work daily differently from the way you greet others from another department or college.

Forni states that there are at least three major arguments for making civility part of our individual cognitive and emotional being. The first is the connection between civility and ethics. In the workplace, this may mean giving credit where credit is due, welcoming a new colleague to the university or abstaining from negative gossip. “Whenever we engage in these acts of civility, in small but significant ways we are acting as ethical agents and exhibiting that kind of ethical behavior that strengthens relationships and society in general.”

Forni’s second reason for civil behavior is the connection between incivility and violence. Rudeness can escalate into physical violence. Over 1.8 million acts of physical violence are reported each year in the workplace. So, modeling and encouraging civil behavior is of great benefit because it can help reduce the level of rudeness that leads to violence.

Forni’s final point is that there is a connection between civility and human health and well-being. We survive and thrive when we have social support and are a part of ‘circles of acquaintance and care,’ whether that comes from a nurturing family or an accepting workplace. A little respect goes a long way in ensuring employee wellness and productivity.

Today’s work environment is much more complex to manage and requires a progressive set of relational skills and awareness to fairness, work-life balance and inclusivity. It requires us to develop a campus culture where courtesy and tolerance are the norm. Anything we can do to promote a harmonious work environment is likely to have a ripple effect on campus. And don’t forget the good resources we do have to help us work through conflict, such as the Employee Assistance Program and the Mediation Center (through the Office of Equity, Access and Diversity).

Successful Project Management Seminar Well Attended On December 14

Over 80 UNL employees attended this seminar, presented by Beth Giesbrecht, from UNO’s Nebraska Business Development Center.

Beth’s key ideas?
- Every project needs a charter, even if it’s on the back of an envelope
- One hour in planning saves 3 hours in executing
- 90% of a project manager’s time is spent communicating
- If it isn’t written down, it wasn’t said

A project charter is composed of a project background, objectives, pre-scope, planning team, planning time estimate and the signature of the project sponsor (who is paying for the project) and the project manager. Utilizing the PMBOK standard of project management, Beth took us from the initiation phase to the closing phase of project management.

We thank Valerie Lefler, UAAD chair of professional development, for organizing a very successful seminar.

Our next Professional Development seminar (March, 2011) features Dr. Paula Wells, who will present on “Management of Continuous Process Improvement.”
